Are we all ADHD?

a stranger posits (an innocent joke, really) but truly, I wonder how fragmented the modern mind is, like a bumbling bee drunk off its own honey.

Crack, the hivemind splits, slurping the sweet drug,
spitting trivial and frivolous facts that are worthless—
Who Wants To Be A Billionaire! the screen screams, and I forget my thoughts.

But I don't forget. Not really. The neglected self remembers—the body keeps score, like a sport live-streamed, eyes glued on the screen, advertisers forced to be seen.

Pay attention to me, the mind begs, but decays
            in the feed of colors and noise, of corporations exploiting human psyche, our vulnerabilities.

I must post to stay relevant.
I must be beautiful to be accepted.
I must, I must, I must—

PAY ATTENTION TO ME, the screen demands, and we listen,
because a still mind is too frightening,
                the world too boring.

Comfort is pleasure, we say to ourselves,
as we rot in our homes
      and wonder why tech billionaires live in this world while we use their tech to escape it.
